Verizon deal gives consumers choices

Editor Clearly, David Lazarus hasn't been paying attention ( Verizon reduces choices, Lazarus at Large, Feb. 15) when he suggests that Verizon's planned acquisition of MCI would be bad for consumers.

Communications choices continue to proliferate as technology evolves and competitors vie for a market once controlled by Ma Bell, the old AT&T. Millions of Americans who once relied exclusively on traditional phones today use wireless phones for local and long-distance calls. Cable companies offer voice service. Internet telephony startups like Vonage are growing fast. Wi-Fi and wireless broadband provide alternatives to traditional hard-wired Internet access. The monopoly days of traditional telephone service are gone and an additional layer of regulation will only slow down innovation and drive up costs for everyone.

Meanwhile, companies like Verizon are investing billions in fiber-optic networks to give consumers new choices in broadband and in TV services formerly offered by only cable and satellite TV companies. The proposed deal with MCI will allow Verizon to compete in the business communications arena and offer consumer services that MCI could not, such as a one-bill solution including wireless service from Verizon Wireless.

The bottom line is that the consumers have many communications choices, the large business market needs a strong competitor, and the Verizon purchase of MCI is a positive and logical response to the new reality of the telecommunications industry.
