Questions and Answers: Post-Merger Exelon Senior Leadership Team

New Team

Q: How did Chris Crane select his new direct report team?

A: The selection was made by Chris Crane, John Rowe and Mayo Shattuck. Chris met individually with each member of the Constellation senior management team and consulted with John Rowe and Mayo Shattuck. The proposed selections also were shared with the Exelon board of directors.

Q: What role did Mayo Shattuck play in the selection of the team?

A: Mayo provided input to Chris, and the two are in alignment on the selections.

Q: Who will be responsible for selecting the rest of the leadership team for each organization?

A: The senior leaders identified in today's announcement will work in partnership with their respective business area integration teams to utilize the information gathered during the analysis phase of integration planning to begin organization design for their parts of the combined company. They, along with the integration teams, will be seeking information and input from teams at both companies throughout the design phase, which began on August 30.

Q: Where will the new direct reports be located?

A: Crane, Von Hoene and Gillis will be located in Chicago. O'Brien and Pardee will be located in the Philadelphia area; and Cornew and Thayer will be located in Baltimore. Each will maintain offices in and be a regular presence in Exelon's other key cities (Chicago, Philadelphia and Baltimore), as has been the company's prior practice. As to the utility CEOs, those leaders will each be based in the communities in which the utilities are headquartered.

Q: What salaries are these individuals being paid?

A: Compensation for the named officers (typically the CEO and CFO and three of the highest compensated individuals in a publicly traded corporation) will be made public when it is set by the board, likely to take place late this year or early next year.

Q: Who is responsible for integration planning?

A: Ron DeGregorio and Steve Woerner will continue to lead integration planning through the closing of the merger. After closing, Matt Hilzinger will lead the process of executing the integration plan.

Structure

Q: Does today's announcement complete the senior leadership team?

A: No. Today we announced the senior executives reporting directly to Christopher Crane. Additional members of his Executive Committee and other leadership positions will be identified before closing the merger.

Q: What does today's announcement tell us about the future organizational structure?

A: The organizational structure reflects a number of things, including:

Centralized administrative functions (which follows the Exelon Business Services Company model)

Local authority among the utilities businesses (with oversight to encourage close coordination and top performance through the Exelon Utilities group)

Direct reporting relationship to the CEO for the CFO, as is common at most Fortune 500 corporations and is Constellation's current practice

Direct reporting relationship to the CEO for the generation businesses (Exelon Nuclear and Exelon Power) and the retail/commodities business (Constellation Energy)

Q: Why do more members of the direct report team come from Exelon than Constellation?

A: While not precisely, the overall leadership team (including the positions announced today) is expected to reflect the relative size of both organizations prior to the merger and the relative composition of the post-merger board of directors.

Q: What does the Exelon Utilities organization mean, and how will it affect the local management and autonomy of our utility businesses?

A: It is very important to provide leadership continuity in our utility businesses, which are central to their local communities. Therefore, when the merger becomes effective, Ken DeFontes will continue as CEO of BGE; Craig Adams will be promoted to CEO of PECO; and Anne Pramaggiore will be promoted to CEO of ComEd. These locally-based senior leaders will continue to have the day-to-day responsibility and authority to ensure the safe, efficient and reliable operation of the electric and (in the case of BGE and PECO) gas systems in their service territories and will continue to establish their capital and O&M budgets. The Exelon Utilities organization, under the leadership of Denis O'Brien, is designed to aid all three of these like businesses by promoting close coordination; enabling standardization where appropriate; and facilitating the sharing of best practices to continually improve service to customers.

Q: Were external stakeholders consulted in the selection of this new senior team?

A: No – the decisions were made by Chris Crane, John Rowe and Mayo Shattuck.

Q: Why did Exelon change the CFO reporting structure?

A: As we were building the new senior executive team and evaluating the size and assets of our combined company, we felt the CFO role was more appropriate to be a direct report to the CEO. This also is the normal reporting structure in most Fortune 500 companies.

Q: Did these appointments require board approval?

A: The board reviewed the proposal and informally approved it. The board and the compensation committee will take formal action at the closing of the merger to make the appointments of all officers legally effective.

Investor

Q: Does the Exelon Utilities structure impact the ring fencing efforts previously implemented by CEG?

A: No. The ring fencing structure is designed to ensure that BGE is protected from the bankruptcy of an affiliated company and that its credit rating is separated from its affiliates and based primarily upon its own credit metrics. The ring fencing is not intended to prevent the ultimate owner of BGE from exercising oversight to ensure that the utility is serving all of its stakeholders – including its customers, employees and shareholders. Just as Constellation today oversees the operations of BGE without impairing the ring fencing structure, Exelon Utilities will perform this function after the merger and will serve as a forum to explore best practices among the three large urban utilities that will be in the Exelon family, which will be to the benefit of customers.

Timing

Q: When do these new appointments become effective?

A: They are effective upon the closing of the merger, which is anticipated during the first quarter of 2012.

Q: Isn't it too early to announce the new leaders, since the transaction doesn't close until early 2012?

A: No, it is not too early. While the success of merger is dependent upon approvals from several regulatory bodies, as well as shareholders, the two companies need to plan for integration so that they can begin to operate as a combined company as soon as the merger closes. The naming of key leaders is an important component of Exelon's overall integration plan, and allows for the identified executives to begin work with their business area integration teams on designing their parts of the combined organization.

Q: When is the next level of organizational change going to be announced?

A: The senior leaders named today will begin working with the business area integration teams on designing their organizations during the design phase of integration planning, which began in late August. We anticipate that further leadership positions and organizational structures would be announced in late 2011.

Other Executives

Q: If an executive is not named on this list, should we assume he or she is leaving the company?

A: No, that should not be assumed; today's announcement deals only with the positions reporting directly to Chris Crane, as well as the utility CEOs. There are several more levels of leadership to be announced; and those decisions have not yet been made and will not be announced until late 2011. Unless announced otherwise, all current Constellation officers directly reporting to Mayo Shattuck will remain in their positions through close and until that time will be managing Constellation's business operations.

Transition

Q: How long will the transition be between existing and newly appointed leaders? Will changes go into effect now or Day 1?

A: Exelon and Constellation are two separate companies until the closing of the merger, which means that these leadership changes (and changes to be announced in the future) are not effective until that time. While there will certainly be interaction across company boundaries in the coming months, these dealings will be confined to the integration planning process and the need for leaders to work with the integration team to design their organizations during the design phase and beyond.

Q: What role will each leader play in running the current business until the close of the merger?

A: We anticipate that each company will continue to operate under its existing leadership until the closing of the merger. Any new leader will be focused on integration planning, working with the business area integration teams to design his or her organization.

Q: How will each leader communicate with their new organization prior to when they officially step into their new role at merger close?

A: With the roles of the senior executives now solidified, employees can expect to see these leaders take a more active role in integration planning, working with the business area integration teams to design their combined organization. They and their integration teams will be seeking input and information from individuals on both sides of the transaction to inform that process.

Q: Employees have been told that we should behave as two separate companies until Day 1. With the announcement of Crane's direct reports, how does that affect us now?

A: That remains true - we are two separate companies until the closing of the merger. With the roles of the senior executives now solidified, employees can expect to see these leaders take a more active role in working with the integration teams on designing their combined organization as part of the integration planning process.

Q: What precautions/retention agreements have been put in place to ensure that the companies will have adequate management in place between now and the transition, including if the approval is delayed longer than planned?

A: Each company has retention and severance plan benefits to ensure we keep necessary talent in place through the transition period.
