Performance, Connectivity and Protection Thursday, August 19, 2010 at 8:05 am by George Kurtz

By now you have probably heard the news that McAfee has entered into a definitive agreement to be acquired by Intel. I am really excited about this acquisition because security is as important as energy efficient performance and connectivity when it comes to computing. The combination of McAfee and Intel will significantly increase the protection for consumers and organizations globally and lead to what I believe will be breakthrough security innovations.

Intel to date has focused on energy-efficient performance and Internet connectivity. Today Intel, a name synonymous with innovation, has added security as a third pillar of focus. While you may ask Why? It makes perfect sense to me. Given the current challenges in dealing with the proliferation of virulent malware, bringing software closer to silicon will provide a real advantage for consumers and businesses. Beating back the tide of malware proliferation by changing the game on the bad guys is an exciting proposition.

As mentioned in the official announcement, upon closing of the transaction McAfee will become a division of Intel's Software and Services group. You may be surprised that Intel has a software group, when you commonly think of them as a hardware company. In fact, McAfee is a perfect fit with the Intel acquisition of Wind River, a leader in embedded and mobile software.

McAfee's strategy of protecting the multitude of devices such as ATMs, printers, digital copiers, and cars fits with helping organizations better manage and protect the IP enabled mobile and embedded devices that run Wind River embedded and mobile software. This also dovetails nicely with McAfee's acquisition of Solidcore, a leader in dynamic whitelisting technology that already provides protection for millions of embedded devices.

Obviously we are very early on in the process, but our commitment to provide world-class protection on any platform continues. The only people that should be nervous about this acquisition are the bad guys. Stay tuned for more info....
